It's kind of fun to do the impossible. Walt Disney

What If?
Alice, Golden Empire Council

Games that have more than one way to play encourage kids to think and tap into their resourcefulness. You can adapt almost any game to be a "What If" one. Explain the game, or have the boys go over the rules for a well-known game. Now come up with some "What If…. changes to make to the game. There are no wrong answers to these kinds of questions. The idea is to suggest changes in the rules, the equipment, the playing area, the number of players, how the team is formed – then challenge the boys to play the game using the new changes. After you play the game, ask the boys which way was easier, more fun – and ask them why. Then let the boys come up with their own "What If" games to try.

Every boy deserves a Leader!
